

7 Rising Stars to Watch at the 2018 Armory Show

By Eileen Kinsella & Rachel Corbett

March 8, 2018

Out of all the fairs taking place this week, the Armory Show is the premier arena for blue-chip art and work by the world's most established artists. But there are also many fresh discoveries that can be made for those willing to take a closer look. Here are seven artists showing at the fair who we think you'll be hearing a lot more from in the future.

Farley Aguilar

Within hours on opening day, the New York gallery Lyles & King had sold five of the six paintings they brought by the Nicaraguan-born artist Aguilar, a self-taught painter who sources imagery from vintage photos, at prices ranging from $10,000 to $22,000. The sixth work was on reserve for a museum.

“We’ve had a tremendous response to his work from collectors in New York and Europe as well as American curators,” said gallery co-founder Isaac Lyles. “We’re thrilled.” Aguilar, who lives in Miami (where he won the $20,000 Florida Prize in Contemporary Art in 2015), is now due to have a solo show at the gallery in spring 2019, and he is currently in discussion with several European gallery about representation and shows there too.